Across the global economy, low interest rates worldwide have led markets to expect a huge divergence in savings. This is changing, and along with the surging of emerging-market savers, the Bretton Woods model is in crisis. The yuan, which is rising in the world economy, is likely to exceed 5 per cent, this transition will continue over a decade, and its largest in the world within a decade, and its power is rising. This is changing, and along with the surging of emerging-market savers, the Bretton Woods model is in crisis. The yuan, which is rising in the world economy, is likely to exceed 5 per cent, this transition will continue over a decade, and its largest in the world within a decade, and its power is rising. This is changing, and along with the surging of emerging-market savers, the Bretton Woods model is in crisis. The yuan, which is rising in the world economy, is likely to exceed 5 per cent, this transition will continue over a decade, and its largest in the world within a decade, and its power is rising.