undue influence

Alina Wu says strict rules aimed at curtailing the sway of associations in Macau's political system actually had the opposite effect

Objective rules for the election of the Macau Legislative Assembly, rather than a reduction of the number of seats for political and non-political associations – whether by party, business, professional or civic – might have been a better move. It is significant that associations have seemingly been hijacked by the political parties. The rules could be revised, taking into account the principle of no undue influence by political parties, to give more equal playing fields to political and non-political associations, and to prevent the possibility of a political-for-profit model.

The researchers created a survey to find out how voters in the two capitals were reacting to the high-profile anti-corruption campaign. It found that voters were moderately bothered by the local anti-corruption movement. The researchers concluded that it was an opportunity for genuine democratic change in Macau. But they noted that the election was not without criticism. The researchers found that voters were less enthusiastic about the local anti-corruption movement than in previous elections, and that it was unlikely to have a significant impact on the outcome of the election.

In January, the government launched a public consultation on a new electoral law for Macau. The proposed law would allow for a more participatory and inclusive process for the election of the Legislative Assembly. It would also introduce a system of proportional representation, which would ensure that the elected representation reflects the diversity of the population. The proposed law has been welcomed by many as a step towards greater democracy in Macau.

The researchers concluded that the election was a significant step towards genuine democracy in Macau. But they noted that there were still a number of challenges to be overcome, including the need for greater transparency and accountability in the political system. They also called for continued efforts to reduce the influence of political parties in the election process.

Whistle-blowing... is probably still an effective tool, but it is definitely not a one-way street.

"Second, historical events have left their mark on the society, and the lessons of those events must be remembered. The government must address the root causes of corruption and ensure that justice is served. This is why the government has launched the anti-corruption campaign, and it is why the anti-corruption laws must be strengthened.

Support you no need to sleep out and have to take a nap, you are not asleep, you do not even need to go out to the beach, you can stay at home. The government must ensure that you can have a good night's sleep, and that you are not disturbed by noise.

China’s urbanisation is under threat rapidly but not necessarily in the right direction.

Winston Mok says reform in urbanisation and innovation requires co-ordination across ministries

In this recent piece in the Financial Times, Li Guolin notes that China’s anti-corruption campaign has been both a success and a failure. He argues that the campaign has been successful in exposing corruption and bringing about reforms, but that it has also been a failure in terms of its impact on the wider society.

The researchers conducted a survey of 1,000 Macau residents, and found that 60 per cent of respondents were aware of the local anti-corruption movement. The survey found that voters were more likely to support the movement if they were aware of its activities. The researchers concluded that the movement had a significant impact on the election, and that it was likely to have a lasting impact on the political system.

Despite the recognition of the importance of urbanisation and innovation, there are still many challenges to be overcome. The government must ensure that the reforms are effective and that the society is able to take advantage of them. The government must also ensure that the reforms are implemented in a way that is consistent with the needs of the society. The government must also ensure that the reforms are not used to further the interests of the political parties, and that they are not used to suppress the voice of the people.

In the face of this challenge, the government must ensure that the reforms are implemented in a way that is consistent with the needs of the society. The government must also ensure that the reforms are not used to further the interests of the political parties, and that they are not used to suppress the voice of the people. The government must ensure that the reforms are implemented in a way that is consistent with the needs of the society. The government must also ensure that the reforms are not used to further the interests of the political parties, and that they are not used to suppress the voice of the people.