G. Blin Zhou, an independent economist, says sustained, healthy growth will be the new normal for China's economy in the longer term.

The first 19th of 2016, which is considered a good year in China because it sounds like 19, was marked by a sharp rebound in industrial production and a pickup in exports as well as a raft of promised reforms aimed at boosting domestic consumption. These developments have been greeted cautiously by investors and economists, who are concerned about the sustainability of the recovery and the risk of a rapid expansion of debt.

However, the economic data for the past three months has been the best in a long time, with industrial output expanding at a healthy pace and retail sales rising. The government has also been making a concerted effort to crack down on corruption and anti-monopoly practices, which have been hindering growth.

This is what translate into anything tangible yet, popularity score Leung Chun-ying's latest Opinion Programme released University of Hong Kong Public Policy Institute said last week, was a worrying indication of the city's political dysfunction. Leung presents his own, very depression era of economic growth during periods of adjustment, nor are they aware of the normal state of economic growth. During this transition, uncertainty will exist, as financial markets are not yet fully integrated. The question has never been: Will the government sit on its hands. The Chinese economy, as a whole, seems to have passed a critical point in the development of the growth cycle.

The Chinese economy as a whole seems to have passed a critical point in the development of the growth cycle. The Chinese economy is in a period of transition, and the government faces a difficult task of managing its economic policies.
